

Jamie Mullins says that Chairboys Head Coach, Mike Dodds, is the perfect manager to be working under for his development.

The 20 year old midfielder joins the Blues after playing against them for Brighton in a pre-season friendly last weekend, admitting that it was "a bit of a weird feeling playing knowing I was going to join a few days after.

"I'm just happy that it came through with no issues and I was able to transition into here quite quickly, so it's worked out well."

The Irishman also joked that "I knew probably two days before that game that I'd be coming here after, so I was just hoping that I didn't cause any trouble during the game - I didn't want to come in here having anybody angry with me."

Mullins noted about how impressed he has been with Head Coach, Mike Dodds, and how vital his involvement has been with his move to the club, "I'm really excited to start working with [Dodds], I think there's a clear project here and judging by his track record of developing young players, that's what I'm really excited to come here and do.

"I don't think I can think of a better manager for me to come in and start working with."

When asked to describe himself as a player and what he feels he will bring to the Blues' side, he answered: "I think I'm a technically good midfielder and I'll hopefully bring goals and assists to the team, and creativity to help the club go where they want to go."
